My daughter’s ALLERGIC to EATING

My daughter, professional expressive artist of the visual arts, is also allergic to eating. How on earth could she possibly survive, you might ask? Well, she has found a way, and it’s rather remarkable.

When she was a baby, her pediatrician told me that she wouldn’t be able to eat solid foods until she was at least 6 months old. I was devastated. I had planned on making her a healthy baby, but instead, I was faced with the challenge of feeding her with nothing but formula.

She was a rather fussy eater, and even the slightest change in her diet would cause her to throw up. I tried everything, from baby food to cereal, but nothing seemed to agree with her. It was a constant struggle to find something that would make her happy.

But then one day, I discovered a solution. I started giving her my own food. I’d cut up a piece of fruit or a piece of meat and offer it to her. She seemed to love it, and it was the only thing she would eat.

It took some time, but eventually, we found a way to make her happy and healthy. We started feeding her a special diet, and it has worked wonders.

Now, when she’s hungry, she’ll greet me with a smile and a happy expression. She even asks for more, which is a big change from when she was a baby. It’s amazing to see how far she’s come.

I’m grateful for the support of her doctors and the specialists who helped us. Without them, I don’t know how we would have made it.

So, to all the parents out there who are struggling with a fussy eater, know that it’s possible to find a solution. With patience and determination, you can make it work.

My daughter is happy and healthy, and I couldn’t be prouder. She’s a true inspiration.
